CONCEPT NOTE

Indian patent law achieved international notoriety with section 3(d). A rather unique provision that sets the bar for drug patents relatively higher than most other countries. One which caused considerable consternation for a number of drug majors, and divided the world into two camps: those that hailed section 3(d) and those that hated it!

Notwithstanding this ideological divide, there is no gainsaying the fact that section 3(d) is a “distinct” provision. One that dared to do differently in a post TRIPS world, where the pressure to conform to a globalised patent script was intense. To this extent, section 3(d) promotes diversity in global patent norms.

Section 3(d) also showcases the strength of a democracy, in that it came after extensive advocacy by public interest groups that were able to have a say in an otherwise opaque law making process dominated in the past by largely industrial interests.

Drawing on these attributes of section 3(d), this conference (conceptualised by University of Pennsylvania Law School and IDIA) seeks to explore whether other provisions in Indian IP law (in particular, copyright law and plant variety protection law) reflect similar values: of distinctiveness, diversity and democracy. It will bring together different stakeholders in the Indian IP ecosystem, including lawyers, industry representatives, civil society activists and policy makers.
